“Strawberries may now be had throughout the summer and autumn months in the northern United States. Plants of the everbearing sorts may be set in the spring and a crop secured in the summer and autumn the same year. The plants are very hardy, their foliage is very resistant to disease, and under favorable conditions they continue to produce berries until hard frosts occur. These characteristics make them especially suitable for the home garden.”—From Farmers' Bulletin, 901, Everbearing Strawberries.

EVERBEARING VARIETIES

“The two leading varieties of this type of strawberry, the Progressive and the Superb are notable not only because they produce fruit from the time of the usual crop until late summer or autumn, but also because they are exceptionally resistant to leaf-spot diseases. They are also very hardy. Another remarkable characteristic of these varieties is that if their blooms are killed by frost they soon flower again. Therefore in sections subject to late spring frosts, which often destroy the crop, these varieties are particularly valuable.

Heretofore the everbearing varieties have been grown chiefly by amateurs and by commercial growers who have tested them in comparison with ordinary sorts ; however, a sufficient number of trials of these varieties has been made to indicate their real value for home use and for market in certain sections of the country.”—Farmers' Bulletin, 901.
